Yesterday, we promised to reveal our age. (Oh, dear, are we blushing?)

We happen to be one of the nation's oldest professional clubs for writers. Our parent organization, California Writers Club, launched in 1909. And even then, we knew novice and professional writers had a lot to offer each other.

We still help both build their publishing credits and writing skills through our workshops, classes, critique groups, scholarship, contests, and various publishing opportunities.

The guest speakers at our monthly meetings and annual conference are the successful authors of published novels and screenplays. They're the editors and agents actively looking for new writers. They help our members (and non-members!) make connections in the writing world and offer just the right tips and insights that transform good writing into great writing.

You don't have to be a member to attend. But you might want to be, because our members enjoy:

- Discounts on writers' conferences, workshops, and classes
- Writing contests and prizes
- Mentorship opportunities
- Access to active critique groups in their genres
- Members-only publishing opportunities
